Human Pheromones

People have long debated how much influence scent has on sexual destination. That's not me talking about the most recent warm scent that gets sprayed on you by attractive young women when you go to an upmarket department store, rather it is the virtually unnoticeable odours we all produce usually, human pheromones.

- Every animal, including humans, have a unique fragrance that they provide in order to attract a suitable mate.
- Can you remember the last time you discovered yourself strangely attracted to someone but you couldn't figure out why?
- They were not the kind of person you were generally interested in, but you're drawn very attracted in the sexual sense.

This happens to everyone and it's absolutely pheromones at work. For reasons that can not be explained, some people produce more human being pheromones as compared to people as well as guess what? they're the ones who will almost always be out on a date and never alone if they shouldn't end up being. Someone always wants to be with them.

- Some people create more pheromones at different times of the year and some, especially women, produce more in the course of ovulation.
- That is nature's way of ensuring the survival of the species through acquiring a partner to be able to feed those ova.

“ We all know of or even have experienced the phenomenon of a group of women who live together normally have their month to month menstrual periods at the same time. The pheromones the particular women create influence each other. Once more, no one knows yet the reason why this happens however research is continuing.

Recent study was carried out with couples and twins put in the same position at pubs like a social experiment. The overwhelming results of the experiment had been that the men and women who used man pheromones before they went out were approached much more often and the couples who participated hugged, kissed and had sex more often. In the twins experiment, the actual two that applied a person's pheromones received double the attention and the ones approaching than the twin that didn't apply pheromones.

So if you've been in the dating doldrums or in the sexual desert lately, it might be worth a try to find some human pheromones before your next night out.
